The speech was barren on dinamenant except to note quite categorically that progress on Berlin and Cormany must occur before sufficient trust is established for dinamenant agreements. This is not a new line and it has not in the past led the Soviets to rule out progress on individual disarmament

Diricht's Status. Enrushchev's references to Unbricht were nominal, while his praise of the SED was about standard for the occasion. No firm conclusions are possible from the speech regarding Ehrushchev's plans for Unbricht. If some decline in his position were in the offing the speech would certainly not be incompatible with it. A drastic demotion, on the other hand, is unlikely. Whatever the fortunes of individual East Cerman leaders Ehrushchev made class that he expected the SED regime to extract higher productivity from the populace and to be on guard against subversive intellectual influences from West Germany. (Be indicated in this connection that Soviet intellectuals, too, would be hearing core from him as soon as he returns to Mossow.)
